Preventing the Bad from Getting Worse: The End of the World (Trade Organization) As We Know It?

Bernard M. Hoekman* and Petros C. Mavroidis

Abstract

Recent survey evidence illustrates that many World Trade Organization (WTO) members and trade practitioners believe that the WTO dispute settlement system needs improvement. We make several proposals to improve the operation of WTO conflict resolution, drawing on proposals made by WTO members in the long-running negotiations to improve WTO dispute settlement procedures. We argue that a focus on technical dimensions of dispute settlement is insufficient to prevent a steady decline in the salience of the organization. Revitalizing the WTO as a forum for rule-making is needed both to address the cross-border policy spillovers driving trade conflicts between the major trading powers and to improve WTO conflict resolution. Principals – WTO members – should accept that negotiations to clarify and extend existing rules must be an element of a robust system of dispute settlement and that bolstering WTO dispute settlement is a necessary condition for nascent efforts at plurilateral rule-making to be successful.

1 Introduction

The World Trade Organization’s (WTO) dispute settlement system – compulsory third party adjudication – long held to be the crown jewel of the multilateral trading system, is in crisis, potentially endangering the future of the organization. Starting in 2017, alarm bells began ringing regarding the implications of the dwindling number of Appellate Body (AB) members, the result of the USA blocking new appointments.
as the terms of sitting members expired. As of mid-December 2019, the AB had only one member left, making the WTO appeals function dysfunctional. Many WTO members opposed the demise of the AB, reflecting fears that, without an appeals mechanism, the WTO dispute settlement system will lose much of its predictability and may eventually collapse. The value of negotiated outcomes depends on the ability of signatories to enforce them. If the prospects of effective enforcement decline, there are potentially major consequences for future rule-making efforts in the WTO. The different pillars of the WTO are interdependent. A collapse of its adjudicatory function risks generating a domino effect.

As of October 2020, 14 appeals were pending before the dysfunctional AB, raising the question what the status is of the associated panel reports. It is rather unlikely that WTO members could agree that, in the absence of a functioning AB, panel reports will be accepted as the final word. Such a scenario would signal the effective return to the days of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), with the major difference that the losing party to a dispute cannot prevent adoption of the panel’s findings, given that under the WTO negative consensus is required to block the adoption of reports. Article 16.4 of the Dispute Settlement Understanding (DSU), wherein the WTO Agreement details the process for the adjudication of trade disputes,

---

1. For a compilation of arguments offered by the USA for its stance on Appellate Body (AB) appointments, see US Trade Representative (USTR), Report on the Appellate Body of the World Trade Organization (2020), available at https://ustr.gov/sites/default/files/Report_on_the_Appellate_Body_of_the_World_Trade_Organization.pdf. The first US refusal to join the consensus was in 2016, when it opposed the reappointment of Sheung Wa, a Korean national. The USA did not oppose the appointment of his successor, Hyung Chong Kim, or oppose the appointment of Mrs Hong, a Chinese national, who succeeded Mrs Zhang, the first ever Chinese member of the AB. Starting in 2017 through the end of 2019, the USA opposed all (re-)appointments.

2. Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes (DSU) 1994, 1869 UNTS 401. Art. 17 stipulates the quorum is three. Matters were compounded because Thomas Graham, who stepped down on 11 December 2019, joined a law firm and thus became ineligible to adjudicate disputes. See https://insidetrade.com/trade/former-appellate-body-chair-graham-joins-cassidy-levy-kent. Rule 15 of the AB Working Procedures, WTO Doc. WT/AB/WP/6, 16 August 2010, states that AB members can continue to serve on a case after the expiry of their mandate if they were appointed to hear an appeal before their mandate expired.

3. Although retracted within a few days on agreement on a trimmed budget that significantly reduced the expenses of the AB, the refusal of the US delegation in November 2019 to agree to a ‘business as usual’ WTO budget for 2020 illustrates that the boundary between the AB crisis and the operation of the World Trade Organization (WTO) more broadly is far from watertight. The USA argued that the WTO budget should be reduced given that the demise of the AB should lead to the reconfiguration of resource allocation. See www.bloomberg.com/news/articles/2019-11-12/u-s-is-said-to-raise-prospect-of-blocking-passage-of-wto-budget.

5. General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994 (GATT), 55 UNTS 194.
permits the appeal of panel reports even if the AB is non-operational. If disputes are submitted to panels and appeal ‘into the void’ remains possible, issued panel reports will have no legal value.

At the time of writing, it is unclear how WTO members will address this matter. One response by a subset of the membership has been to develop an interim appeal mechanism. The Multi-Party Interim Appeal Arbitration Arrangement (MPIA), the fruit of an initiative led by the European Union (EU), commits signatories that have acted as complainants or respondents in panels to either accept a panel report or to use the MPIA to appeal findings through a process that closely mirrors what the AB would do. The MPIA is an open plurilateral agreement: participation is open to any WTO member, but its provisions apply only to signatories. The initiative is an important illustration of the increasing willingness by WTO members to cooperate on a plurilateral basis. There is much to be said in favour of open plurilateral agreements as a means of overcoming the constraints associated with the WTO’s working practice of consensus-based decision-making and as a mechanism to recognize the existence of differences in societal preferences and priorities across countries.

However, a plurilateral approach to dispute settlement is very much second best for the trading system. This is because it is unlikely to result in an internally coherent jurisprudence, which is the raison d’être of any appellate process. Moreover, it will not help to support the nascent shift to negotiate plurilateral agreements on substantive

---

6 DSU, supra note 2; Agreement Establishing the World Trade Agreement (WTO Agreement) 1994, 1867 UNTS 154.
7 DSU, supra note 2, Art. 16.4 reads: ‘Within 60 days after the date of circulation of a panel report to the Members, the report shall be adopted at a DSB meeting unless a party to the dispute formally notifies the DSB of its decision to appeal or the DSB decides by consensus not to adopt the report. If a party has notified its decision to appeal, the report by the panel shall not be considered for adoption by the DSB until after completion of the appeal. This adoption procedure is without prejudice to the right of Members to express their views on a panel report.’ Ironically, the first test case for this involved the USA. On 18 December 2019, the USA lodged an appeal ‘into the void’ against an Art. 21.5 compliance panel report (WTO, United States – Countervailing Duties on Certain Hot-Rolled Carbon Steel Products from India DS436). In a subsequent document (WTO Doc. WT/DS436/22, 16 January 2020), the two disputing parties clarified that they would submit an appeal only when an AB Division could be established.
9 The Multi-Party Interim Appeal Arbitration Arrangement (MPIA) builds on Art. 25 of the DSU, which provides for arbitration of disputes among WTO members if all parties agree and notify their decision to pursue arbitration to the WTO. The text of the MPIA was circulated: ‘Statement on a Mechanism for Developing, Documenting and Sharing Practices and Procedures in the Conduct of WTO Disputes: Addendum’, WTO Doc. JOB/DSB/1/Add.12, 30 April 2020. As of end October 2020, 24 WTO members had signed on to the MPIA (counting the European Union (EU) as one): Australia, Benin, Brazil, Canada, China, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, the EU, Guatemala, Hong Kong China, Iceland, Macao China, Mexico, Montenegro, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Pakistan, Singapore, Switzerland, Ukraine and Uruguay.
matters in the WTO. Plurilateral agreements by their very nature will have varying membership, reflecting differences in interests and objectives across WTO members. Engagement by WTO members in one or more new plurilateral initiatives will be facilitated by access to a uniform dispute settlement process through which commitments can be enforced. A common system of dispute settlement that can be used across all existing WTO agreements as well as new plurilateral agreements will ensure greater predictability, facilitate incremental expansion in participation and lower transactions costs.

The AB crisis is usually presented as the USA against the world. Absent US refusal to replace AB members as their terms expired, the AB would still be in place and functioning. The situation, nevertheless, is more complicated. Even though other WTO members did not support the US method to express dissatisfaction with the workings of the AB, many of the issues raised by the USA are not new. Over the years, many suggestions to improve the operation of WTO dispute settlement have been made by WTO members and outside experts, to little effect. The proximate reason is the WTO’s working practice, notably consensus-based decision-making. Long recognized as an impediment to decision-making, consensus has become more difficult to attain due to rising geopolitical rivalry between the USA and China and, more broadly, shifts in the structure of the global economy (the rise of large emerging economies). While there are strong arguments in favour of requiring consensus for the adoption of the results of substantive negotiations on policy matters, over time consensus increasingly came to be accepted for the day-to-day business of the WTO, ranging from setting agendas for committee meetings to procedural matters. Consensus permitted the USA to block new AB appointments.

Agreement between the major trading powers is a necessary condition for resolving the WTO dispute settlement crisis. Such cooperation must go beyond the AB to consider the dispute settlement system more broadly and extend to revitalizing the deliberation and negotiation functions of the organization. Even if the AB crisis is resolved, the WTO can only serve as a forum to adjudicate disputes regarding the implementation of WTO agreements and specific commitments made by members. The WTO is not a court of general jurisdiction in all matters regarding the interpretation of international law, like the International Court of Justice (ICJ). If the ‘legislative function’ of the WTO continues to stall, the volume of adjudication before the WTO will suffer as 11 As is clearly reflected in the proposal to the Dispute Settlement Body (DSB), eventually supported by 120 WTO members, calling for launching selection processes to fill AB vacancies. See Appellate Body Appointments, WT/DSB/W/609/Rev.17, 28 February 2017.

---

well, even if the membership manages to overcome the AB crisis. The WTO therefore confronts a two-fold challenge: (i) to address the current conflict on the operation of the dispute settlement mechanism and (ii) to establish its capacity to support engagement between members to address the policy spillovers that have led to major trade tensions between the large trading powers, notably the USA and China. In this article, we argue that these two challenges share a common feature: they call for revitalizing the WTO as a forum for rule-making.

The WTO is still breathing on the rule-making front but only shallowly. New rule-making has shifted away from the multilateral forum, reflected in the many preferential trade agreements (PTAs) that WTO members have concluded since the creation of the WTO in 1995. As argued in previous work, PTAs are no longer the outside option; they have become the default option.14 In part, this reflects the use of issue-linkage strategies and veto playing in WTO deliberations that is made possible because of the consensus working practice.15 More fundamentally, it reflects the nature of the policies involved: consensus on an issue may be impossible if national preferences differ substantially. The WTO must accommodate plurilateral cooperation if it is to ‘compete’ with PTAs. In 2017, WTO members started down this track by launching plurilateral negotiations, and this is a positive development. For the WTO to remain relevant, this process must result in substantive agreements. The feasibility of achieving such outcomes – whether on a plurilateral basis or encompassing all WTO members – will depend on effective enforcement. Re-establishing the latter requires the members to go beyond resolving the AB crisis and engage in negotiations to improve the dispute settlement system more generally. We argue that a key element of needed improvement is for arbitrators to be required to call on the WTO membership to clarify or establish applicable rules in instances where disputes involve issues where disciplines are not clear or missing.

The article is organized as follows. Section 2 briefly summarizes the main findings of a survey of trade practitioners and WTO delegations regarding their perceptions of the AB and WTO dispute settlement more broadly. In Section 3, we reflect on the experience of the long-running and unsuccessful DSU Review, the forum established by negotiators in the Uruguay Round to consider the operation of dispute settlement. Section 4 argues that the failure of the DSU Review parallels the failure of the WTO members to update the substantive rules of the game and that this is in part due to the working practice of consensus decision-making. The shift to plurilateral cooperation offers a path forward, but it depends importantly on effective conflict resolution mechanisms. Section 5 presents several suggestions on dispute settlement reform, emphasizing a need to rely more on negotiation in instances where rules are not clear or do not exist. Section 6 concludes.

14 Hoekman and Mavroidis, supra note 10.
2 WTO Dispute Settlement: Institutional Design and Organizational Procedures

How much do WTO members and the trade community care about WTO dispute settlement? Is the USA an outlier in how it assesses WTO performance in this area? The use of WTO dispute settlement procedures is highly skewed towards large and richer players. A similar pattern applies when the focus of attention is on participation in WTO deliberations on the AB in the 2016–2019 period, during which the USA consistently blocked new appointments to the AB. Those who use the system more, engage more in deliberations on reform and efforts to address the AB crisis. Most WTO members are bystanders. This conclusion is bolstered by a 2019 survey of WTO delegations and trade practitioners to elicit their perceptions regarding the operation of the dispute settlement system. Officials from 25 WTO members responded to the survey. Both developed and developing WTO members participated, as did law firms engaging in WTO dispute settlement process, academics and think tanks. Importantly, a marked preponderance of responses originated in the largest traders, more open and richer economies, the heaviest users of the system. A commonality across the survey responses and indicators of participation in dispute settlement is that many developing countries do not engage. Most WTO members asked to complete the survey did not do so. Bearing in mind that survey responses are skewed to those with enough interest to respond, we draw two main conclusions from the survey responses. First, respondents are generally supportive of the design of WTO dispute settlement, and the basic features of the DSU are regarded as desirable. Second, many respondents expressed some concern with the way the AB has exercised discretion in pursuing its mandate.

A Support for the Basic Institutional Design

Were we to characterize the design of dispute settlement (the DSU) as the legal ‘institution’, and the AB as a key ‘organization’ entrusted with its administration, it

18 In what follows for the purposes of characterizing responses to the survey, total WTO membership is defined as comprising 136 – that is, we count the (then) 28 EU member states as one.
19 Survey response rates are often low, but, in this case, the low level of response is rather striking given that the questionnaire targeted governments and professionals directly concerned with the imminent demise of the AB, a high-profile issue in the Geneva trade community at the time the survey was run (mid-2019).
20 No government officials from China, Japan and the USA responded. Moreover, no officials from large emerging economies such as Mexico, Russia, Indonesia and Argentina that are active in the DSU and DSB debates participated in the survey. is the organizational aspect of dispute settlement, and, more specifically, its practice, that dominates the concerns expressed by the USA, not the design of the institution as such.\textsuperscript{21} It is noteworthy that the institutional design aspects of the DSU were heavily negotiated during the Uruguay Round, whereas its organizational features were given little attention. Article 17 of the DSU leaves the elaboration of AB working procedures to the AB. This delegation is no longer accepted by the USA.

Most respondents agree on the objective function of dispute settlement at the WTO and strongly support the introduction of compulsory third party adjudication, as negotiated in the Uruguay Round. Most regard the AB, as such, and WTO dispute settlement in more general terms, to be of critical importance to the functioning of the world trading system. This sentiment is quite rational. There are two foundational reasons why enforcement is necessary for the WTO to function. First, governments may have incentives to renege on negotiated commitments. Even though the distinction (and ensuing classification) between good- and bad-faith disputes remains an unsolvable conundrum in contract theory, political economy forces might tilt the balance towards less defensible interpretations of agreed obligations, provoke retaliatory reactions by other parties and unravel cooperation. Enforcement through peaceful means is a mechanism to avoid such an outcome.

Second, enforcement is necessary because WTO agreements are incomplete contracts. It is impossible to negotiate every policy affecting trade, as any policy potentially can affect trade. Two options exist to address a need to ‘complete’ the contract: (re-)negotiation and adjudication. Re-negotiation has an advantage over adjudication in that it binds all WTO members. The downside is that it is very onerous, given the large number of WTO members (164), their heterogeneity and the fact that decisions are adopted by consensus. Adjudication, on the other hand, binds only the parties to a dispute, although the de facto precedential character of AB rulings is a mitigating factor. The upside is that adjudication involves only the volition of the complainant. As such, it may be perceived as the only feasible option to complete the contract and allow it to produce its intended results.\textsuperscript{22}

Assuming precedent is observed, adjudication becomes quite attractive as a means to do so.\textsuperscript{23}

\textsuperscript{22} This arguably is too narrow a view given that other forms of dispute resolution are available to WTO members, such as raising specific trade concerns in committees. Bolstering the use of such alternative mechanisms to defuse conflicts and resolve concerns is arguably one important dimension of WTO reform. See R. Wolfe, \textit{Reforming WTO Conflict Management: Why and How to Improve the Use of ‘Specific Trade Concerns} (2020), available at \url{https://cadmus.eui.eu/handle/1814/67970}.

\textsuperscript{23} The USA, of course, has voiced strong criticism against the presumption of binding precedents in WTO case law, a matter on which the DSU is clear.
B Polarization on Organization and Performance

Although there is widespread agreement in favour of keeping a two-instance compulsory third party adjudication in place, a substantial share of survey respondents indicate that dispute settlement is not doing what it should be doing and/or does not consistently deliver high quality output. Some 55 per cent of all respondents believe panel reports are sometimes biased. This number increases for Geneva-based officials who are involved in dispute settlement, 70 per cent of whom perceive that panel reports are sometimes biased. Many business respondents and legal practitioners believe that the AB has not provided coherent case law (40 per cent and 50 per cent, respectively). Almost one-third (30 per cent) of officials in capitals dealing with dispute settlement agree that the AB has not provided coherent case law. More than three-quarters of Geneva-based officials directly involved in dispute settlement who responded to the survey indicate agreement with the statement that the AB has at times acted inconsistently with the DSU.

A sizeable share of survey respondents regard case law as sometimes incoherent and have doubts regarding the absence of bias in reports. Of specific relevance to US concerns, 42 per cent of respondents agree the AB has gone beyond its mandate, violating Article 3.2 of the DSU, which calls on adjudicating bodies not to undo the balance of rights and obligations negotiated by the membership. The shares are higher for government officials based in Geneva involved in dispute settlement (50 per cent) and practitioners in law firms (60 per cent). We do not know what the basis for these views are. One potential factor may be perceptions of undue influence of the Secretariat in drafting reports. Also of note is that survey respondents from developing countries were more inclined to agree that WTO dispute settlement is too expensive, that bilateral consultations are preferable to the submission of disputes to the WTO and that the introduction of monetary damages would be desirable in making the system more relevant to them. There are also clear splits across the rich–poor divide regarding whether business is well informed on foreign market access barriers (in rich countries, the response is an overwhelming ‘yes’, whereas in poor countries, it is the opposite).

Our takeaways from the survey responses, on the DSU’s patterns of use, and participation in the Dispute Settlement Body (DSB), the WTO council overseeing the operation of the DSU, are that: (i) the system is primarily of interest to large and richer players; (ii) there is near universal agreement on the appropriateness of the institutional framework; (iii) many insiders agree with some of the concerns raised by the USA regarding the operation of the system; and (iv) specific design features may reduce the salience of the system for low-income countries. Some of these dimensions figured in the DSU Review, to which we turn next.

24 Specific numbers in this and the following paragraph are from Fiorini et al., supra note 17, which reports much more detailed results.

3 The DSU Review

Much of the commentary on the AB crisis gives the impression that the conflict is a recent one, part of the more general attack by the Trump administration on multilateral institutions. Unfortunately, the crisis is not totally idiosyncratic, although the very confrontational stance taken by the Trump administration was unprecedented. Basic elements of US scepticism about the DSU were already expressed over two decades ago. In 1995, worried about the powers that the newly formed AB might exert, Senator Robert Dole suggested a ‘three strikes’ rule: a US review panel would evaluate whether the AB had overstepped its mandate, and if it happened three times, it would recommend a withdrawal from the WTO.26 In recognition of such concerns, and because the DSU was a major innovation, Uruguay Round negotiators built in a formal review of the operation of the dispute settlement system. The DSU Review was to commence within four years of the entry into force of the WTO. The formal DSU review called for in the Marrakesh decisions was to be completed by the end of 1998. The review was subsequently extended until August 1999, with the intention that the results would be dealt with at the Seattle ministerial meeting. No conclusion proved possible, and informal negotiations continued. These were folded into the Doha negotiations, with the ministers establishing a mandate to use the work done up to that point as a basis for negotiations to improve and clarify the DSU.27

A What Was the DSU Review Meant to Accomplish?

The DSU Review was meant to be a forum for WTO members to address problems with the implementation of the DSU and to improve it, if warranted. Envisaged to conclude by 2004, the process never led to any agreement. The review was tasked with generating suggestions to ‘improve and clarify’ the DSU. It was extended beyond the original deadline of 2004 and formally remains ongoing. In principle, therefore, it provided an institutional mechanism through which matters underlying the AB crisis could have been addressed. Members did not have to establish a new group or committee to deal with the AB crisis since all of them could have participated in the DSU Review.

Although pressure for tweaking the DSU was not strong in the early 2000s, given a general sense that it was working well, the DSU Review still generated many proposals to improve the operation of the DSU.28 As is the case for other dimensions of dispute settlement, participation in the review has tended to be limited to the large players, but 27 Formally, the DSU Review was not part of the Doha Development Agenda single undertaking but a stand-alone exercise. See WTO Ministerial Declaration, Fourth Session of the Ministerial Conference, Doc. WT/MIN(01)/DEC/1, 20 November 2001, para. 30. Some early problems, such as sequencing, were addressed. The WTO Analytical Index mentions various agreements destined to observe sequencing, available at www.wto.org/english/res_e/publications_e/ai17_e/dsu_art21_oth.pdf. Notwithstanding the existence of an agreement, the issue recurred in DS316. Inconsistent practice was one of the main reasons why the DSU Review was necessary.

28 McDougall, supra note 12.
many developing countries also put forward proposals. Of interest for the topic of this article is the extent to which the review included key criticisms voiced by the USA and whether similar issues were raised by other members.

B Issues Discussed in the DSU Review

A June 2019 report by Ambassador Coly Seck (Senegal), the latest chairperson of the group charged with review and updating of the DSU, provided an update on the state of play after 20 years of discussion. This report is at the same time an admission that the process was deadlocked and a succinct description of what has happened so far. We say ‘so far’ since, technically, the DSU Review is still running. As of 2019, matters that had been tabled dealt with the following subjects: (i) mutually agreed solutions; (ii) third party rights; (iii) strictly confidential information; (iv) sequencing; (v) post-retaliation; (vi) transparency and amicus curiae briefs; (vii) time frames; (viii) remand; (ix) panel composition; (x) effective compliance; (xi) developing country interests; and (xii) flexibility and member control.

Although some major issues like remand were on the agenda, many others were not. These included fundamental design issues such as the nature of available remedies, liability rules (caps) and operational issues such as the use of panellists not included in national rosters and whether the WTO Secretariat should have discretion in adding panellists to the approved roster. WTO members had different views on the salience of the various subjects included on the DSU Review’s negotiating agenda. Since the focus in this article is to examine the AB crisis within the larger WTO crisis, and since it is the USA that created the former, we divide the subjects addressed in the review into those raised by the US delegation and those raised by the rest of the membership. The USA was isolated in some, but not all the concerns it raised.

1 Issues Raised by the USA

Issues raised by the USA reflected its view that the AB is an agent of the WTO membership (the principals) and, as a result, has no business going beyond what the principals tasked it with through the DSU. In practice, the USA argued that it had done so. The agency nature of the AB is, of course, unambiguous. The wording of Article 3.2 of the DSU leaves no doubt in this respect:

29 Special Session of the Dispute Settlement Body: Report by the Chairman, Ambassador Coly Seck, Doc. TN/DS/31, 19 June 2019. Issues included matters such as the remedies available (e.g. Bronckers and van den Broek ‘Financial Compensation in the WTO’, 8 JIEL (2005) 101) and the feasibility-cum-incentives to use of dispute settlement procedures by and against low-income countries (see, e.g., Bown and Hoekman, ‘Developing Countries and Enforcement of Trade Agreements: Why Dispute Settlement Is Not Enough’, 42 JWT (2008) 177.

30 We abstract from the question whether the US decision that led to the AB crisis was the consequence of its disillusion with the DSU Review process or the outcome of a separate process aiming to insulate the Trump administration from the nation’s international obligations. What we are interested in is to determine what issues were raised by the USA in the DSU Review.
The dispute settlement system of the WTO is a central element in providing security and predictability to the multilateral trading system. The Members recognize that it serves to preserve the rights and obligations of Members under the covered agreements, and to clarify the existing provisions of those agreements in accordance with customary rules of interpretation of public international law. Recommendations and rulings of the DSB cannot add to or diminish the rights and obligations provided in the covered agreements. (Emphasis added)

It is the alleged violation of the institutional mandate that the main critique of the AB by the USA aims to redress. It was raised in the DSU Review under agenda items that came to be called ‘flexibility and member control’ and ‘additional guidance for WTO adjudicative bodies’. Discussions under this heading did not explicitly focus on the potential re-engineering of Article 3.2 of the DSU but, instead, revolved around increasing political (member) control and oversight of the AB.

A 2002 proposal put forward by the USA and Chile on ‘improving flexibility and member control in WTO dispute settlement’ was aimed in large part at addressing the US concern regarding some AB rulings on safeguards and subsidies. AB practice in the realm of safeguards had made recourse to this instrument a quasi impossibility. Moreover, the AB finding that the US foreign sales corporation legislation, which exempted US exporters from US taxes, was an export subsidy generated significant ire in the USA. It is unlikely that the Chile–US proposal was motivated by concerns about the AB case law on anti-dumping (zeroing) since cases on this matter before 2002 concerned the use of zeroing by the EU. Whatever the case, the proposal called for the removal of specific panel or AB findings by mutual agreement of the disputing parties, permitting for the partial adoption of dispute settlement reports and ‘some form of additional guidance to WTO adjudicative bodies’. Many WTO members rejected this on the basis that it would benefit the large players in the WTO. The same was true for a complementary proposal by the USA to make the dispute settlement process more transparent and open to the public.

2 Issues Raised by Other Members

Other proposals made in the DSU Review might have helped prevent the AB crisis if they had been adopted. An example is an EU suggestion to establish a permanent body of panellists (that is, a true first instance court). This could have reduced the need for appeal by improving the quality and consistency of reports and reducing the discretion of (reliance on) the WTO Secretariat in the selection of panellists and in the drafting of reports. The EU subsequently withdrew this proposal due to a lack of support, reflecting concerns that members of a permanent panel body might be ‘too’ independent.\textsuperscript{35}

---

Proposals by developing countries addressed issues that reflected size and capacity differentials. One proposal was to introduce retroactive remedies, including payment of legal costs by the losing party, in instances where a WTO member does not implement a ruling. Another was to permit collective retaliation. Many WTO members have long resisted this proposal on the basis that the objective is not to punish but, rather, to maintain a balance of rights and obligations (the reciprocal bargain). A practical problem with collective retaliation is that it implies a direct intrusion in sovereignty – the WTO would be requiring its members to raise tariffs.\textsuperscript{36} A more fundamental problem is that it is not incentive compatible. For example, developed countries might undo a coalition of developing countries by offering tailor-made preferences to some states. The fear of losing out on some, even if imperfect gifts, can be a powerful incentive for beneficiaries to ‘bite the bullet’. It is not very surprising therefore that developing countries withdrew their proposals on remedies. The majority of those proposing collective retaliation eventually joined other groups and supported proposals that did not address the question of retaliation.

It is fair to conclude that the WTO membership did not see eye to eye on the focus of the DSU renegotiation. This was in and of itself a very important hurdle for the membership to overcome, as failure to agree on at least the prioritization of issues to negotiate led to the establishment of a long, unmanageable list. Another problematic feature of the DSU Review was that the agenda included matters where little meaningful was likely to emerge. Examples included questions about effective compliance and developing countries’ interests. Compliance can never be effective unless one addresses the asymmetric bargaining power of institutional players, an issue that many members did not want to address. Past practice must have persuaded the membership that developing countries’ concerns were adequately addressed through the introduction of longer transitional periods and/or provisions calling for developing countries’ interests to be considered. Instead of focusing on the low-hanging fruits and allowing them to crystallize into law areas of emerging agreement, negotiators embarked on an open-ended discussion where nothing was agreed until everything had been agreed.

Some of the issues raised by the USA during 2018–2019 – for example, the continued application of Rule 15 or the distinction between facts and law – could and should have appeared on the agenda of the DSU Review, but they did not.\textsuperscript{37} The rigidity of WTO working practices (consensus) precluded the review from playing the \textsuperscript{35} Hauser and Zimmerman, \textit{supra} note 33.

\textsuperscript{37} Rule 15 appears in the Working Procedures of the AB. It allows for members who have been appointed in an AB division to adjudicate a dispute, to continue their work until completion of the proceedings, even if their mandate has in the meantime expired. The USA has cast doubt on the legitimacy of this practice since, in its view, it has been abused. The AB, on the other hand, is not a trier of facts and should confine itself to reviewing the legal issues. The US critique in this respect is that the AB, by conflating issues of law and facts, has on occasion ended up discussing factual issues (such as understanding of domestic law, which is, as per WTO standing jurisprudence, a factual issue), over which it has no jurisdiction.
role intended by the framers of the WTO Agreement. While the counterfactual cannot be determined, it seems reasonable to assume that at least some, and perhaps many, US concerns could have been addressed. A necessary condition for this would have been greater willingness to accept proposals on which there was broad agreement and flexibility in agenda setting. An insistence on making the dispute settlement negotiations a package deal (a mini ‘single undertaking’) resulted in no agreement on anything. This, combined with rigid insistence on sticking to an agenda established in the early 2000s, essentially made the DSU Review an exercise in futility. Worse, as discussions dragged on for years, the process came to be regarded as one that could not be used to address the increasingly urgent disputes about dispute settlement.

C The Price of Neglecting Institutional Design Dimensions and Inflexible Approaches

Although the need for consensus impeded a resolution on the matters raised, the organization of discussions did not help either. Participants opted for a ‘Christmas tree’-type of approach, where all and sundry would table their wish list, and discussions would proceed on that basis. It is not hard to imagine alternative approaches with greater prospects of success. WTO members, for example, could have decided first on what practice has revealed to be missing from current rules or proceeded based on grievances regarding practice. It appears there was no attempt to establish criteria for including items in the agenda. Once items had been included in the long agenda, the approach taken towards the negotiations was to pursue each issue sequentially\(^38\) in the special session of the DSB (that is, the DSB in negotiating mode) to reduce the scope for WTO members to engage in issue-linkage attempts.\(^39\)

The DSU Review started with an attempt to collect the low-hanging fruits, where de facto agreement had emerged through consistent practice. A prominent illustration is the ‘sequencing issue’. This issue pertained to the question whether requests for authorization to retaliate must await the definitive outcome of a compliance panel. The short answer is yes. Request for retaliation cannot, as a matter of (legal) logic, precede a finding of lack of compliance. Otherwise, the risk is that a member could be authorized to retaliate against practices that eventually are found to be WTO compliant.\(^40\)

When this type of ‘harvesting’ proved more difficult than anticipated, the Christmas

---

\(^38\) In response to some participants wanting to make more rapid progress, the work on the last four issues on the DSU agenda (panel composition, effective compliance, developing country interests and flexibility and member control) was pursued through separate, parallel meetings. Special Session of the Dispute Settlement Body, Report by the Chairman, Ambassador Coly Seck, Doc. TN/DS/31 17 June 2019, at 3.

\(^39\) ‘In the absence of a collective political will to promptly complete the DSU negotiations, proponents have in some cases sought to establish linkages across unrelated issues. While such approaches are common in multilateral trade negotiations, this has also limited the ability for the various proposals to be considered on the basis of their individual merits’ (ibid., para. 1.11).

\(^40\) Following the initial EC – Bananas III litigation, where the opposite had been the case, the decision to authorize countermeasures had followed findings by compliance panels to the effect that the findings of the original panel had not been implemented. The only exception to this rule is the December 2019 report on the Airbus-Boeing saga. DS316.
tree became unmanageable, and none of the items appearing on the agenda were negotiated to conclusion. The most contentious issues, including those voiced by the US delegation in and outside the WTO, were never discussed in a comprehensive manner, let alone with a view to concluding an agreement.

Once it had become clear that the AB dispute was likely to have serious repercussions, one would have expected the membership to change course. The inability to respond flexibly to changed circumstances and priorities is an illustration of the inefficiencies associated with the WTO’s working practice based on consensus. The experience of the DSU Review illustrates the opportunity cost of the WTO’s working practice. This is not to say that no efforts were made. The absence of results from the DSU Review induced several informal efforts aimed at improving the operation of dispute settlement. One was a dialogue orchestrated by the Secretariat focused on matters not tabled in the review— that is, for which there was no negotiation mandate. This did not lead to significant results. A more meaningful effort was a separate consultation process launched by the General Council in December 2018, facilitated by Ambassador David Walker (New Zealand). This process focused on the specific issues raised by the USA regarding the functioning of the AB. Unfortunately, this proved to be too little too late.

At the end of the day, the lack of attention paid to the organizational dimensions of adjudication during the Uruguay Round came home to roost. Because the primary legislation (the DSU) was quite rudimentary in this regard, the AB was left to determine the detailed working procedures for itself. This is where Rule 15 was decided, a core element of US discontent. One can only speculate what the situation might have been had such working procedures been clarified and agreed by the principals in the DSU Review, the mechanism foreseen by Uruguay Round negotiators to address such matters. The bottom line is that the ‘thornier’ issues plaguing adjudication at the WTO were not addressed through legislative interventions informed by deliberations in the DSU Review. Arguably, this issue is the heart of the matter.

4 Revitalizing the WTO as a Forum for Rule-making: Green Shoots?

Since the creation of the WTO, new rule-making on trade-related policies mostly has been the domain of PTAs. This pattern was documented over a decade ago for agreements involving the EU and the USA. More recent research confirms that 41 This process was launched in 2010 and engaged with WTO members, panellists, trade law practitioners and Secretariat staff involved in WTO dispute settlement. See Secretariat’s informal consultations concerning the panel process. available at www.wto.org/english/tratop_e/dispu_e/informal_consultations_e.htm.

---

42 Several issues included in Ambassador Walker’s mandate were part of the DSU Review, including adherence to time frames, gap filling and rulings on matters where WTO rules are ambiguous (item xii of the DSU Review). Providing for remand authority (item viii of the DSU Review) was not part of the consultation but arguably could have helped by reducing a perceived need by the AB to step in for panels.

PTAs increasingly include policy areas not addressed by the WTO and/or go further (‘deeper’) than WTO disciplines.\textsuperscript{45} Moreover, the EU and the USA are no longer the primary drivers of this trend – it has become a widespread phenomenon.\textsuperscript{46} One reason for this situation has been the difficulty of attaining consensus in the WTO on new issues. Given that club-based approaches to deepening trade cooperation are the revealed preference of many WTO members, the challenge for the WTO is to become more salient in providing a forum for the negotiation of plurilateral agreements and offering a platform for the gradual multilateralization of specific dimensions of PTAs.

Initial steps in this direction were taken at the end of 2017 with the launch of ‘joint statement initiatives’ and ‘dedicated discussions’. After more than a decade of fruitless Doha round stalemate, groups of WTO members launched plurilateral talks on e-commerce, the domestic regulation of services, investment facilitation and measures to support the ability of small firms to use the trading system. Many of these subjects involve ‘behind-the-border’ policies. Their subject matter overlaps with the type of issues that arose in the DSU context in that the agenda centres on determining good practices, organizational design and administrative processes. This contrasts with the bread and butter of trade agreements: negotiating away border barriers through reciprocal exchange of market access concessions. This technology is less effective to reduce the trade costs associated with differences in domestic regulatory choices. Other approaches to internalizing policy externalities are required because it is not possible to ‘cut’ domestic regulation $A$ by $x$ per cent in exchange for an equivalent ‘cut’ in foreign regulation $A$, let alone to exchange a ‘cut’ in regulation $A$ for a ‘cut’ in regulation $B$.\textsuperscript{47}

There is a further complication. Except for the Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights, WTO members are free to design their policies if they apply them in a non-discriminatory manner.\textsuperscript{48} This is the essence of the negative integration approach embedded in the GATT: policies are unilaterally defined and must be applied in a non-discriminatory manner. GATT think does not encompass ‘binding’ domestic policies, which means that reciprocity will be obtained only at the time the negotiation occurs, if at all. Since WTO members retain the right to change domestic policies in the future, reciprocity is only accidental at any point in time after the original negotiation, as policies can become more restrictive if they apply in a non-discriminatory manner. Reciprocity becomes a dead letter the day after concluding \textsuperscript{46} The Comprehensive and Progressive Agreement on Trans-Pacific Partnership, available at https://www.iilj.org/wp-content/uploads/2018/03/CPTPP-consolidated.pdf, is a prominent example, as are the many agreements negotiated by Australia, Chile, Mexico, Singapore and so on.

\textsuperscript{47} Hoekman and Sabel, ‘Plurilateral Cooperation as an Alternative to Trade Agreements: Innovating One Domain at a Time’, 12 Global Policy (2021) 49.

\textsuperscript{48} Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights 1994, 1869 UNTS 299.
the original negotiation. Non-discrimination does nothing to encourage one WTO member to adopt more liberal policies or to discourage another from imposing more restrictive domestic policies over time.

Commitments on non-discriminatory domestic policies affecting trade and investment require a different logic. It becomes necessary to determine areas in which governments have similar goals, to agree on what makes for good policy in each area and to accept that governments may use different approaches to pursue similar goals. This is not straightforward as countries may have different goals and disagree on what makes for good policy. It is, therefore, not surprising that cooperation on domestic regulation occurs among like-minded players in plurilateral settings. This goes beyond PTAs to span sector-specific cooperation outside trade agreements. The EU’s adequacy decisions regarding data protection that permit free cross-border data flows are an example.\textsuperscript{49} The EU’s timber importation regime – the Forest Law Enforcement, Governance and Trade program – is another.\textsuperscript{50}

Pursuit of plurilateral agreements under WTO auspices that span cooperation of this kind will help ensure the organization stays relevant. For the green shoots to take root and create fertile ground for additional initiatives, including efforts to revisit Doha Round issues, they must generate meaningful outcomes. A key dimension of the ‘value proposition’ offered by the WTO in this regard is enforcement, as new (plurilateral) agreements must have effective conflict resolution mechanisms. To some extent, enforcement is likely to be agreement specific, reflecting the idiosyncrasies of the subject matter and content of plurilateral agreements.\textsuperscript{51} But insofar as they entail binding enforceable policy commitments, signatories must have access to an effective dispute settlement mechanism. It is likely that a necessary condition for all the major players to consider participating in new plurilateral agreements is that their associated conflict resolution mechanisms address the institutional design weaknesses of the DSU that led to the AB crisis. Doing so through more general reform of the DSU will support the shift towards plurilateral rule-making in the WTO.

5 Suggestions for Dispute Settlement Reform

In what follows, we assume, consistent with the survey responses discussed above, that the WTO membership continues to favour a two-instance compulsory third party adjudication. We further assume that voting to commence the process of appointing new AB members\textsuperscript{52} is not on the cards, given fears that this will set a precedent and potentially confront WTO members with unwanted outcomes in other areas down the road. The simplest way to resolve the AB crisis would be to ask the USA what would be required for it to withdraw its blocking veto. WTO members did this repeatedly during 2019 to no effect. There are good reasons to believe that some of the US concerns were either ex post facto justifications or diversions. An example is the alleged overstepping of the 90-day deadline for rulings imposed by the DSU. The AB has generally violated the statutory deadline to issue a report by only a few days on average. Panels routinely have incurred much longer delays. On average, panels issue reports 15.5 months after their establishment. The statutory deadline is six to nine months. If the USA cares about respect for deadlines, it should chastise panels. It has not.

\textsuperscript{52} For an argument that this was the appropriate response to the US decision to block all new AB appointments, see Petersmann, supra note 8.

A consistent feature of US criticism has been the haphazard treatment of the idiosyncratic standard of review embedded in the WTO Agreement on Antidumping. Article 17.6 of this agreement, introduced at the insistence of the US delegation in the Uruguay Round, was meant to act as a deferential standard in favour of interpretations adopted by investigating authorities if panels find there is more than one permissible interpretation. US negotiators’ understanding was that Article 17.6 served as a green light for ‘zeroing’, a practice designed to inflate dumping margins. Over time, the absence of AB restraint on zeroing led to rising ire in the USA. We have little sympathy for anti-dumping as an instrument of protection and even less for the practice of zeroing. Our antipathy is predicated on economic first principles. Whatever one’s views on this matter, AB members are agents per Article 3.2 of the DSU and must not undo the balance of rights and obligations determined by the principals. The AB was required to give meaning to Article 17.6 of the Agreement on Antidumping. The US critique is that they only paid lip service to it. This critique is well founded. Panels and the AB have routinely repeated a statement to the effect that the Article 17.6 standard of review is not at odds with the generic standard of review, and, as a result, have not seriously engaged with Article 17.6. Likely little would have changed with respect to zeroing case law had the AB approached the interpretative issue from the angle of Article 17.6. It is unfortunate that it did not do so.

---

54 See Hoekman, Mavroidis and Saluste, supra note 34.
55 Agreement on Implementation of Article VI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994, 1868 UNTS 201.
56 This argument is developed in an article by two Uruguay Round negotiators and the GATT Secretariat member in charge of anti-dumping at the time. See Cartland, Depayre and Woznowski, ‘Is Something Wrong in the WTO Dispute Settlement?’, 46 JWT (2012) 979. However, the negotiating record reveals little explicit discussion on zeroing. The US concerns went beyond this, explaining why the USA requested that a deferential standard of review be inserted in both the anti-dumping and subsidies context. A declaration agreed to this effect called for eventually symmetric treatment in the two agreements, even though the membership never managed to agree to ‘export’ the Article 17.6 standard into the Agreement on Subsidies and Countervailing Measures (SCM Agreement) 1994, 1867 UNTS 14.
Linked to the zeroing discussion is the claim by the USA that the AB has been overstepping its mandate. In the case of zeroing disputes, it is a matter of debate whether the AB overstepped its mandate in its handling of Article 17.6. While it may have misconstrued the agreed standard, its actions are hardly a clear-cut case of diminishing rights agreed and acknowledged by the framers. There was no widespread agreement over zeroing as otherwise the text would say so explicitly. Article 17.6 is an example where negotiators papered over a disagreement, raising the question if and how panels and the AB should address such instances. We return to this issue below. Leaving zeroing aside, there are other cases where the AB has clearly overstepped its mandate, even though no WTO member – including the USA – has complained about it. Any time the AB ‘completes the analysis’, it effectively deprives the membership of the two-instance adjudication that they had agreed upon. Because of the ‘incompleteness’ of the original WTO contract, staying within the mandate is probably the hardest DSU discipline for the AB to observe. In the case of egregious violations, like the case law concerning ‘completing the analysis’, it might be easy to pronounce in favour of the disrespect of the mandate. Most issues, however, are not egregious. The law versus facts dichotomy is an illustration to this effect. Factual matters can be presented as legal issues with some imaginative expression. This might explain why, notwithstanding any sympathy some WTO members may have with the USA on this score, there is no agreement on the appropriate course of action to address the situation.

Renegotiation of the zeroing issue is probably the wisest path forward, as case law continues to be erratic on this matter. An alternative approach would be to exempt anti-dumping and countervailing duty cases from appellate review. While this would address one major source of US dissatisfaction with the AB, this ‘pragmatic solution’ falls short in resolving the more fundamental problem that arises when rules are fuzzy or leave gaps. Where they are not clear, rules should be clarified by the WTO membership. The same is true more generally with respect to claims that the AB has overstepped its mandate in filling gaps. Such matters call for action by WTO members to clarify the applicable rules. One way to reduce the pressure on the AB in such instances would be for the WTO membership to require the AB not to rule on matters where the rules are unclear (as is already required by Article 3.2 of the DSU, which prohibits the AB from undoing the balance of rights and obligations reflected in WTO agreements) and go beyond this by requiring the AB to ask the WTO bodies that are

---

58 On the issue of overreach and references to the legal literature on this question, see, e.g., Zhou and Gao, “‘Overreaching’ or ‘Overreacting’? Reflections on the Judicial Function and Approaches of WTO Appellate Body’, 53 JWT (2019) 951.

59 This is not to deny there are factors that help understand why such outcomes might arise in practice, e.g. the absence of remand and the ensuing urge of the AB to issue rulings within short time limits.

60 In April 2019, the panel on WTO, US – Price Differential Methodology (DS534), went head on against 25 years of AB case law and found that zeroing can be WTO consistent.

responsible for the implementation of the agreements invoked in a dispute to clarify the rules or fill a gap. In parallel with measures to further professionalize adjudication (see discussion below), such action should reduce the likelihood that adjudicators do not adhere to Article 3.2. For idiosyncratic reasons, this should substantially attenuate concerns that the AB might exceed its mandate.

A Dispute Settlement: Agents and Principals

The tensions created by the imbalance between consensus-based decision-making and independent adjudication were already identified in the mid-1990s. In a prescient book, Claude Barfield pointed to two major concerns: first, the prospect that the AB would ‘legislate’ issues that could not be resolved because of the inability of the membership to achieve consensus and, second, that adjudication would be invoked for highly divisive (political) matters – what Robert Hudec called ‘wrong cases’. Barfield cites several trade practitioners to this effect, including Alan Wolff, who is quoted stating:

[The main problem of the current system is] the inappropriateness of placing on dispute settlement the burden of resolving major issues among the largest trading nations that in the final analysis cannot be resolved other than by negotiation among sovereign states. ... There is no substitute for commercial diplomacy in relations among sovereign states. Resolution of differences where matters of national interest are concerned cannot be fobbed off for third party resolution in the trade arena, just as they cannot in the foreign policy context.

Barfield proposed both an ex ante and an ex post mechanism to redress both types of problem cases. Ex ante, a ‘deciding officer’ (a WTO official entrusted with this function), would work with litigants to find a mutually agreed solution instead of submitting disputes to formal adjudication. This would come close to ‘meditation’, as we know it from practice. Ex post, a representative (but not majoritarian) sample of the WTO membership could decide on the non-adoption of submitted reports. Today’s discussions, viewed from this prism, sound like déjà vu.

62 This is exactly what the panel on WTO, US – Softwood Lumber IV, did when facing the question of out-of-country benchmarks under Art. 14 of the SCM Agreement, supra note 56. It expressed its sympathy with the US view but declared it had no power to undo the balance of rights and obligations as struck by the framers. The AB did just that. The USA, however, did not complain of aggressive overstepping of the mandate (which it clearly was) by the AB since it had profited from the decision.

65 Barfield, supra note 63, at 118; see also Wolff, ‘Reflections on WTO Settlement’, 32 The International Lawyer (1998) 951.

We believe that in addressing these types of issues the WTO could draw on the doctrine of ‘non liquet’, where a court can deny ruling on an issue if it finds it has no law at its disposal to do so. In a way, the insistence of the USA to introduce Article 17.6 in the WTO Agreement on Antidumping is a ‘mild’ form of non liquet. The ICJ, being a court of general jurisdiction, is opposed, in principle at least, to non liquet, even though because of the difference between the ICJ and the WTO, one would have expected the ICJ to have followed a different path. WTO adjudication bodies, per the DSU, are empowered to deal only with trade disputes and must do so without undoing the balance of rights and obligations as struck by the framers (Article 3.2 of the DSU). The ICJ can rule on any issue of international law and is used to having recourse to general principles of law to resolve disputes when the letter of law does not provide it with enough guidance. WTO adjudicators are reticent in emulating this technique. Consistent empirical analysis suggests that panels and the AB have had recourse to general principles only to cement a finding that they had already reached. Recourse to general principles reduces the need to invoke non liquet. And, yet, the ICJ has used it in the Nuclear Tests case, while WTO panels and the AB have never done so.

There is a legitimate question to ask here: who should decide whether the law that is needed to adjudicate (elements of) a dispute is missing, and, hence, whether there is a case of non liquet? While we recognize that a WTO panel (or the AB if cases are appealed) dealing with the specific dispute may be reluctant, asking adjudicators to do so may be the most straightforward approach. A pronouncement of non liquet would entail that the membership should reflect on the necessity to step in and ‘complete’ the contract. This would cover instances where rules are unclear as well as cases where matters are raised that have a bearing on the functioning of the WTO contract but are not (yet) regulated at the multilateral level. To illustrate, we present an example of each type of situation.

Consider first an example where the rules are unclear: the status of bilateral investment treaties (BITs) under the GATT. Investment and trade can be both complements and substitutes. Trade can be enhanced through foreign direct investment (FDI) – for example, a Canadian company using a factory in Japan that imports parts and components to produce products that are shipped to many destinations. FDI may also remove the rationale for trade if what would have been imported is instead produced for the local market by an affiliate. Focusing on the former scenario, assume Canada has signed a BIT with Japan and China claims this is a measure affecting trade and that Canada must observe the most-favoured-nation (MFN) obligation. Do BITs come under the purview of MFN? The dominant view is predicated on practice and responds in the negative. What if China nonetheless raises a claim before a panel? What would be the legal reason for objecting to the Chinese claim?

An example of the second case (no law) is the treatment of amicus curiae. Empirical analyses of this practice before the US Supreme Court show that amicus curiae have been influential in shaping decisions. This matter is not regulated in the DSU. The AB came up with a halfway house, where amici can submit, but panels are not obliged to take their views into account. There is no agreed procedure on submissions across cases. As a result, over time, amici submissions have dwindled, and it is questionable if they have had any influence at all. Considering evidence that this could be a powerful instrument to help raise awareness of WTO panels to societal sensitivities, it may have been better for the AB to simply refer the matter back to the membership and ask for clear guidance on the treatment of amicus curiae. The AB did not do so. Instead, its imaginative understanding of Article 13 of the DSU did not help address this issue.

---

The argument for adjudicators not stepping in for the WTO membership in the latter type of situation (no law) is particularly strong. As discussed above, putting the burden on the shoulders of the membership as opposed to the adjudicative function would be to require – as a procedural matter – the AB to request the relevant WTO committees and bodies to clarify the pertinent commitments, if rulings hinge on the interpretation of the invoked provisions of a WTO agreement. This innovation would clarify that an implication of Article 3.2 of the DSU is that non liquet applies if there are gaps or serious ambiguity in the applicable rules.

B Non Bis Peccatur (A Cat Won’t Sit on a Hot Stove Twice)?

Resolving the AB crisis requires consensus, as dispute settlement applies to all members. This does not imply that all WTO members must engage actively: the way to consensus starts with agreement among the relatively small group of WTO members most concerned with a functioning conflict resolution mechanism – that is, the large trading powers that are customarily the most active participants (see section 2 above). Such agreement is not only necessary but also probably sufficient, given that the USA has made clear that veto players have nowhere to hide by becoming the ultimate veto player. The USA has demonstrated that it is no longer willing to play the role of a benign hegemon and accept that other (developing country) WTO members engage in ‘business-as-usual’ linkage games.

In our view, corrective actions to introduce stronger checks and balances on the AB must operate ex ante. Flirting with ‘back-end’ solutions, such as introducing a mechanism to correct the AB ex post, can only give AB members the wrong incentives. Panels and the AB unavoidably will have substantial discretion, as they must interpret one incomplete contract (the WTO) by using another incomplete contract (the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, which does not assign specific weights to its various elements). Feasible contracts like the GATT/WTO are inevitably incomplete ex ante. If it were possible to write a more complete contract, it would have happened. By this statement, we do not deny that marginal improvements are impossible.

---

To the contrary, we have already argued in favour of a legislative solution to clarify the status of zeroing in WTO law. Intelligent legislators are in constant reactive mode and ‘complete’ the contract gradually based on (learning from) experience.

Greater selectivity when appointing adjudicators and paying more attention to the organizational aspects of dispute settlement processes could do much to prevent the type of situation that has arisen. Experienced adjudicators would not have totally neglected Article 17.6, for example. In the case of the GATT, organizational aspects of adjudication were to be part of the International Trade Organization, which never saw the light of day. This explains the original birth defect. Subsequently, the focus was on rule-making and legal institutions, not on the organizational aspects of dispute settlement. This is not to say that the system did not work well. As Hudec explains in his monumental study of GATT dispute settlement, it was largely thanks to the GATT’s pragmatic resolution of disputes that the system evolved into compulsory third party adjudication following the 1988 Montreal Mid-Term Review.

As the membership gradually became more heterogeneous, it became more difficult for the GATT to operate as a relational contract. Hudec shows that the rate of adoption of panel reports in the post-Tokyo Round era fell dramatically. By the time of the Uruguay Round, the GATT contracting parties had accumulated extensive experience regarding the vicissitudes of dispute settlement and the problems posed by the absence of detailed procedures. They also were fully aware that they should focus on organizational aspects as part of the establishment of the WTO. Importantly, they had also acquired first-hand experience with ‘back-end’ solutions – the notion that greater ex post political review of dispute settlement and ‘member control’ could address perceived adjudication mistakes. The best example is the transatlantic dispute on taxation concerning domestic international sales corporations (DISC), where the GATT Council decided to undo in part the findings of the dispute settlement panel, only to provoke the wrath of the aggrieved party, the USA. John Jackson and Hudec provide excellent accounts of the litigation and its eventual aftermath. This experience helped incentivize the process of shifting towards a more rules-based dispute resolution system. Those proposing ‘back-end’ solutions today should be reminded of the scars the DISC litigation left on the GATT dispute settlement system.

72 Davey, ‘Dispute Settlement in GATT’, 11 Fordham International Law Journal (1987) 51, provides an excellent account of the evolution of GATT dispute settlement until the launch of the Uruguay Round. Davey makes clear that efforts were concentrated on crystallizing practice into legal documents of varied legal value.

74 Ibid.

76 For discussion of this case, see P.C. Mavroidis, The Regulation of International Trade (2016). US business proposals made in December 2019 calling for an oversight body, including independent experts, do not constitute what we call back-end solutions as they are limited to review and issuing a recommendation whether the AB has violated one of the Walker principles (discussed below). See https://insidetrade.com/daily-news/business-pro-trade-groups-propose-fixes-wto-appellate-body.
One would expect that, against this background, negotiations would include a focus on the organizational aspects of dispute adjudication, the neglected issue under the GATT. It was not meant to happen. This was not for lack of volition but, rather, because the DSU negotiators had bigger fish to fry (or so they thought). Their focus concentrated on addressing US unilateralism, with little to no effort devoted to organizing the work of the panels and the AB.\textsuperscript{77} It is high time this happened. There are different options, ranging from a reinstatement of the AB with limited tweaks to address US concerns to reforms that revisit the composition and work of the panels as well as the AB and the role of the Secretariat. More structural reforms can be envisaged that do away with the need for an appeal function by bolstering the panel process.\textsuperscript{78} Assuming that WTO members want to retain a two-stage process – as indicated by the survey summarized in section 2 – the following elements could usefully find their way into a future negotiation on WTO dispute settlement reform:

- Professionalize the panel stage of the DSU by creating a standing roster of 15–20 permanent panellists, where:
  - panellists should serve for one extended term of 8 to 10 years;
  - depending on the criteria to be defined (new issues; value of disputes and so on), disputes are heard by divisions of three (relatively less important) or divisions of seven (relatively more important);
  - decisions are taken by majority; and
  - dissenting opinions are published.
- Expand the AB to comprise nine members as opposed to seven (in recognition of the case load observed in recent years), with:
  - appointees serving one long term of 8–10 years on a full-time basis;
  - cases decided by divisions of three AB members;
  - decisions taken by majority vote;
  - the publication of dissenting decisions; and
  - the collegiality requirement maintained.
- To increase the prospects that qualified and experienced individuals are appointed as adjudicators, WTO members should establish a commission of eminent experts – a combination of lawyers, economists and experienced WTO practitioners who are well versed in GATT/WTO dispute settlement. This group would be tasked with screening nominations for panellist and AB appointments put forward by WTO members and asked to determine if the proposed adjudicators are eligible for the proposed job.\textsuperscript{79}

\textsuperscript{78} Hoekman and Mavroidis, ‘To AB or Not to AB? Dispute Settlement in WTO Reform’, 23 \textit{JIEL} (2020) 703, argue that achieving the basic goals of the DSU does not necessarily require an AB – a strengthened panel stage may suffice.
\textsuperscript{79} Weiler has argued along the same lines. See Weiler, ‘The Rule of Lawyers and the Ethos of Diplomats’, 35 \textit{JWT} (2001) 191.
Article 255 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union\textsuperscript{80} could serve as inspiration for such \textit{ex ante} scrutiny of proposed adjudicators.

The members of the commission should be decided on a consensus basis by the WTO membership.

WTO members select adjudicators (fill vacancies) from the pool of candidates that the commission has determined to be eligible for the respective positions.

- Both the AB members as well as panellists should have the right to appoint their own clerks.
  - The number of clerks serving each judge should be decided \textit{ex ante}.
  - AB members may select only one clerk of their own nationality.\textsuperscript{81}

Of course, there is much more to think about when considering how to improve WTO adjudication. The above points are basic elements that could help address some important dimensions such as the quality of judges, the incentives of adjudicators to please their nominating party and potential confusion regarding the functions of the WTO Secretariat. Take the last point and, more specifically, the allegation that the Secretariat unduly influences the outcome of disputes.\textsuperscript{82} Nordström was the first to ask the question whether the WTO Secretariat behaved like a ‘secretary’ or went beyond this in holding the pen when drafting reports.\textsuperscript{83} Given missing expertise and weak incentives, it is to be expected that the Secretariat is influential.\textsuperscript{84} That said, panellists and AB members have the last word. Even if this is not the case de facto,\textsuperscript{85} irrespective of the extent to which the Secretariat is an actor in dispute settlement, there are good reasons to create stronger firewalls when it comes to dispute adjudication. Two distinct functions – providing advice to WTO members on legal matters and providing \textsuperscript{80} Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union. OJ 2016 C 202/47, Art. 255 reads as follows: ‘A panel shall be set up in order to give an opinion on candidates’ suitability to perform the duties of Judge and Advocate-General of the Court of Justice and the General Court before the governments of the Member States make the appointments referred to in Articles 253 and 254. The panel shall comprise seven persons chosen from among former members of the Court of Justice and the General Court, members of national supreme courts and lawyers of recognized competence, one of whom shall be proposed by the European Parliament. The Council shall adopt a decision establishing the panel’s operating rules and a decision appointing its members. It shall act on the initiative of the President of the Court of Justice.’

\textsuperscript{81} Some of these suggestions have also been made by other observers. See, e.g., Busch and Pelc, ‘Does the WTO Need a Permanent Body of Panelists?’, 12 \textit{JIEL} (2009) 579; McDougall. \textit{supra} note 12. We assume that a reformed WTO dispute settlement system retains an appeals body.

Our suggestions complement the principles proposed by New Zealand Ambassador David Walker to address US concerns with the operation of the AB. These proposals include ensuring that appeals are completed within 90 days; that Appellate Body members do not serve beyond their terms (assuming, of course, that they have been effectively replaced beforehand); that precedent (case law) is not binding; that facts cannot be the subject of appeals; that the AB be prohibited from issuing advisory opinions and that its findings cannot add obligations or take away rights provided by the WTO Agreements. All of these are fully consistent with – and, indeed, often echo – what is in the DSU. For this reason, they should be amenable to all WTO members and serve as the basis for the substantive agreement needed to address the core US concern – credible measures to ensure the AB will stick to its mandate.

One lesson from recent events is that more political oversight and interaction between WTO members and a reconstituted AB are needed. Some type of advisory review process to assess the consistency of the operation of WTO dispute settlement bodies with the ‘Walker principles’ may help provide greater assurance that matters relating to the performance of the AB can be given greater attention in the DSB. However, at the end of the day, insofar as members believe that the AB is exceeding its mandate (for example, in filling gaps), this calls for (re)negotiating the substantive provisions of specific agreements. In thinking about how this can be encouraged, it is helpful to distinguish between substantive rules, on the one hand, and organizational-cum-procedural matters, on the other – that is, the operation of WTO bodies tasked with implementation of WTO agreements. In the area of dispute settlement, one such procedural change would be to permit the AB to remand cases back to the panels in cases where the panels have exercised judicial economy and the AB has reversed a panel decision. As noted above, another, more important change would be to require the AB to ask the relevant WTO bodies to clarify the applicable substantive rules in instances where there are gaps or the rules are unclear. Such changes need approval advice on the same issues to panels – are in practice conflated and can easily be confused, casting doubt on the ‘impartiality’ of panels, even if the bias is unconscious.86

86 US business groups have proposed ‘term limits for members of the Appellate Body secretariat no longer than eight years, equal to the maximum term for an AB member, to rebalance power within the appeals process, give primacy to the reasoning of Appellate Body members and ensure staff help to write decisions, not make them’. See https://insidetrade.com/daily-news/business-pro-trade-groups-propose-fixes-wto-appellate-body. Hirsh, Resolving the WTO Appellate Body Crisis: Proposals on Overreach, paper commissioned by the National Foreign Trade Council, December 2019.

88 See, e.g., the proposal made by the EU, China, Canada, India, Norway, New Zealand, Switzerland, Australia, Republic of Korea, Iceland, Singapore and Mexico in a 23 November 2018 communication to amend the DSU to address the procedural issues raised by the USA. See WTO, Doc. WT/GC/W/752.

89 This would enhance the efficiency of the dispute settlement process by avoiding the parties having to launch a new case to address the arguments that the panel did not consider.

90 Payosova, Hufbauer and Schott, supra note 12. This, of course, implies going back to consensus decisions. But here the WTO membership will have to ask itself what is preferable: to continue with judicial activism, which could comport all sorts of negative consequences, or ensure that the membership is fully behind a rule?
from the membership – that is, the DSB. Extensive preparatory work will be required before such proposals can be placed on the DSB agenda for a decision. As these are matters that relate to the operation of the WTO, preparing the ground should involve the active engagement of the director-general as an ‘honest broker’ and the leader of the organization.91

Sceptics might argue that the prospects of any such agreement in the current context are rather dim. We do not underestimate the difficulty associated with re-establishing trust among the large players, a sine qua non for agreement on procedural DSU reforms. In our view, the Walker process is a good illustration that consultations and dialogue among WTO members can identify areas where there is broad support for considering specific actions of a procedural nature. While no action on Ambassador Walker’s report proved possible before the demise of the AB in early December 2019, the process clearly demonstrated that many WTO members were willing to revisit Article 17 of the DSU (which leaves the elaboration of its working procedures to the AB to determine) as well as other DSU provisions.

6 Concluding Remarks

Numerous scholars have held up the WTO dispute settlement system as the organization’s crown jewel.92 That the jewel has imperfections is neither surprising nor contested. The problem is that the WTO membership collectively was unwilling to make timely repairs and allowed the jewel to crack. The dispute settlement crisis is an opportunity to address concerns regarding the quality of the output of the WTO adjudicating bodies, both the panels and the AB, and to revisit their institutional mandates. To this effect, we have advanced some proposals aiming to ensure their independence and impartiality and respond to the stated preference of WTO members and trade practitioners for a two-instance compulsory third party adjudication system that will predictably interpret the agreed trade agreements.

Overcoming the AB crisis is critical for the survival of the WTO. In contrast to nascent plurilateral approaches to cooperate on new issues or to deepen existing rules, a plurilateral approach to dispute settlement as has been put in place through the MPIA is not desirable as a long-term solution. The ‘plan B’ thinking that underlies the MPIA is a constructive response to the AB deadlock but should remain a time-bound interim arrangement. The focus of the WTO membership should be to launch a concerted effort to address long-standing concerns about the operation of the DSU, including 91 Insofar as the large traders and most of the membership support such procedural changes, if necessary, recourse to voting could be envisaged, as foreseen by the WTO Agreement, supra note 6, Art. IX. We are very cognizant of the strong antibodies against voting in the WTO, and although we believe voting on procedural matters should be considered in instances where a large majority supports a proposal on a procedural matter, in practice voting should not be needed if procedural changes are well prepared and supported by the key players.

---

92 A search in Google Scholar on the keywords WTO, jewel and crown returned over 1,000 citations (June 2020).
both the role and operation of the panels as well as the AB. Effective WTO dispute settlement procedures must be available and apply to all WTO members. If they do not, WTO case law will cease to provide the predictability demanded by traders, and the prospects for new rule-making – whether multilateral or on a plurilateral basis – will be affected negatively. For the WTO to offer a robust platform for negotiation and implementation of open plurilateral agreements (OPAs) as either a complement or a substitute for PTA-based cooperation, it needs to offer an effective dispute settlement system to all WTO members considering participation in OPAs. The alternative is OPA-specific conflict resolution mechanisms, which would lead to divergence in case law and, more generally, remove a key incentive for states to consider plurilateral cooperation under the umbrella of the WTO as opposed to doing so outside the WTO.

The resolution of the AB impasses requires the subset of WTO members most concerned with effective dispute settlement to launch negotiations on specific procedural dispute settlement reforms, building on the ‘Walker principles’. The professionalization of WTO dispute settlement, as we propose above, will only be possible if accompanied by measures to ensure that the core US concern is addressed – that is, that adjudicators do not exceed their mandate and engage in rule-making. This goal can be achieved by putting in place clear guidance for panels and the AB that requires cases where the findings hinge on the interpretation of unclear treaty provisions that call for ‘gap filling’ or the establishment of rules to be sent to the pertinent WTO bodies with the request to clarify the applicable rules or negotiate them. If it is not possible for the membership to do so, the dispute simply will not be resolved. Non liquet throws the ball back to the principals, where it belongs: the WTO membership. More broadly, it is the WTO members that need to agree on new rules in new areas and revisit existing rules where these need to be updated. An inability (or unwillingness) to do so lies at the heart of the problem confronting the WTO and ultimately will lead to the organization becoming less relevant even if the AB can be resuscitated.

The WTO reform discussions that some members have engaged in since 2018 provide a basis on which to build. In doing so, we believe it is helpful to differentiate between process and procedure, on the one hand, and substantive disciplines, on the other. There are very good reasons for consensus when it comes to (changes in) the substantive rules of the game that apply to specific trade-related policies. WTO members should be able to decide not to join a consensus that alters their rights and obligations if they perceive this is contrary to their interests. But consensus should not enable countries to block others that wish to explore cooperation in an area. Nor should consensus apply to processes and the day-to-day business of WTO bodies such as whether to invite outside experts to inform the deliberations of a committee.

This applies to dispute settlement as well. Procedural changes in the implementation of the DSU by the institution lie at the heart of any resolution of the AB crisis. Such changes require deliberations and decisions by the membership to implement specific reforms to improve the operation of the DSU. If necessary, such process-related changes could be subject to a vote, as envisaged by Article IX of the WTO Agreement. Doing so is not in the DNA of the organization, for good reason. We strongly support the principle of consensus-based decision-making when it comes to substantive rules and negotiated rights and obligations. If institutional/procedural reform proposals are well prepared – informed by consultations and supported by the good offices of the director-general – voting should not be needed in any event, especially if action is taken to place the burden of completing the contract where it is needed to resolve a conflict on the WTO membership, not the dispute settlement bodies.

Addressing the judiciary crisis is a necessary, but not sufficient, condition for addressing the broader challenge confronting the WTO. It is necessary not because the AB must be saved at all costs. It is necessary because of the risk that the WTO contract cannot be enforced because of multiplying appeals into the void. With or without the AB, what matters is to retain the key innovation that was introduced by Uruguay Round negotiators when crafting the DSU: agreement on depoliticized compulsory third party adjudication. Even if members are able to resolve the AB conflict, absent progress on revitalizing the legislative function, the WTO courts will be limited to ruling on agreements dating back to 1994. Although we have yet to observe forum diversion with respect to the adjudication of trade disputes, we certainly do in the realm of rule-making, where most of the action has been in PTAs. OPAs offer the opportunity to bring rule-making back to the WTO. Harnessing that opportunity requires an effective system to adjudicate disputes that is available to, and supported by, all WTO members.